Catholic Question Corner

Q With the new English translation of the missal it seems, in the priest's prayer at the consecration, which Jesus has gone from saving "all" to saving "many". That sounds more like Calvinism than Catholicism. Because of free will, not everyone will follow Jesus, but didn't He die to save us all?

A For 40 years, until Advent of 2011, we heard the priest say at the consecration of the precious blood, "It will be shed for you and for all so that sins may be forgiven." Now instead, the priest says that Christ's blood "will be poured out for you and for many for the forgiveness of sins."

Because of what we had become used to, the new wording might sound restrictive and selective, as though Jesus did not intend for all to be saved. That, though, would be misunderstanding.

Clearly, it is central to Christian belief that, Paul says in 2 Corinthians 5:15, Christ "indeed died for all, so that those who live might no longer live for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised."

What explains the new wording? To start with, it is closer to the Latin of the Roman Missal, which has always said, for hundreds if not thousands of years, "pro multis" or "for many," rather than "pro omnibus" or "for all."

The reason why the Latin uses "pro multis" is that this language is more faithful to the Scriptures. Isaiah 53:12 prophesied that the Messiah would take away "the sins of many," and Jesus himself at the Last Supper said that his blood would be shed for "many" (Mt 26:28 and Mk 14:24).

An advantage of the new translation is this: It reminds us that salvation is not completely automatic, imposed in a mechanical way against our will; instead, we must "buy into" the salvation won by Christ by our belief and our behavior.
